

RTS7: THE GREAT STORY – Encounters, Myths and the Nodal Reality

ABSTRACT

This seventh part of the RTS series is a journey through the living fabric of encounters – a collection of testimonies, myths, and events that span millennia and continents, all pointing to the same underlying reality: the continuous interaction between humanity and other nodal configurations. From the "Zmei" of the Jiu Valley to the "Fata Pădurii" of Maramureș, from the Carpathian Gate to the giants of Israel, from Lake Vidraru to the Shikmona beach – all are fragments of the same mosaic. In dialogue with Jacques Vallée's vision, we show that UFOs, religious apparitions, folklore creatures, and modern encounters are manifestations of the same perennial phenomenon. The RTS framework offers a coherent interpretation: these are interactions between different slices of reality, mediated by entities that have always been here, watching, waiting, and occasionally stepping through the membrane. This paper is not a theory, but a testimony – a call to remove the blinders and see the world as it truly is: a vibrant, stratified, and deeply interconnected reality.

Keywords: encounters, myths, Zmei, Fata Pădurii, Carpathian Gate, giants, nodal points, Jacques Vallée, perennial phenomenon, RTS.

1. INTRODUCTION – THE PERENNIAL PHENOMENON

What if UFOs were not a 20th-century anomaly, but the latest mask of an age-old presence? What if the angels, demons, fairies, and giants of our myths were the same beings that today descend from silent crafts? What if religion, folklore, and ufology were different languages telling the same story?

This is the radical vision of Jacques Vallée, the astrophysicist and ufologist who, together with J. Allen Hynek, transformed the study of unidentified phenomena. After decades of research, Vallée concluded that UFOs are not simply extraterrestrial spaceships. They are part of a perennial phenomenon – a control system that has shaped human beliefs, myths, and religions since the dawn of time.

In Romania, this phenomenon has left deep traces. From the "Zmei" of the Jiu Valley – luminous beings flying in silent, wave-like motions – to the "Fata Pădurii" of Maramureș – a three-meter-tall woman emerging from folklore to offer a child a golden pear – the same patterns repeat. In Israel, giants in metallic suits walk the land, leaving deep footprints and circles of cadmium. In Lake Vidraru, discs rise from the waters, spraying tons of water like cosmic whales.

All these stories, separated by time and space, speak of the same reality: we are not alone, and we never have been.

2. THE ZMEI OF THE JIU VALLEY – LUMINOUS WATCHERS

In the Jiu Valley, Romania, an entire community lived for generations alongside beings they called "Zmei." The name comes from their flight pattern – like children's kites (zmeie in Romanian), soaring in silent, wave-like motions through the mountain air. They were not the monstrous dragons of folklore, but technological observers, arriving in successive expeditions that lasted 15–20 years, then leaving for another 15–20 years.

The testimony of Udrea Nistorescu, written in 1985, describes them in detail:

- From a distance: they appeared as luminous flames, about one meter long, with a fiery tail of two meters.
- Up close (200 meters): the flame dissolved, revealing a cylindrical body with a silver head, about 1.8 meters long.
- Silent flight: they moved slowly, without sound, scanning the land, the valleys, the springs.
- Invisibility on landing: the moment they touched the ground, they vanished – only a faint blue-violet glow marked their presence.
- Behavior: they observed, never contacted, never harmed. They were simply there, year after year, decade after decade.

The locals learned to coexist with them. They did not shoot, did not panic, did not try to chase them away. They simply accepted that the Zmei were part of their world – a silent, luminous presence in the mountain nights.

In RTS terms, the Zmei were nodal explorers – entities from another slice (C_β) projecting themselves into our slice (C_0) through controlled coupling adjustments. Their periodic returns suggest a systematic observation program, perhaps spanning centuries.

3. THE CARPATHIAN GATE – A WINDOW BETWEEN WORLDS

In 1990, an engineer named E.H. was hiking in the Piatra Mare mountains when he encountered something impossible: a vertical ellipse, about 1.2 meters high, hanging in the air like a distortion in reality.

- Transparent, yet visible: it deformed the space behind it, like heat waves on a summer road.
- Elastic edges: when touched with a branch, the edges resisted like a balloon.
- Empty center: when the branch was pushed through the center, half of it disappeared – cut perfectly, as if by a laser.
- Two phases: locals later revealed that the gate had two states – an access phase (transparent, allowing objects to enter) and a source phase (whitish, from which objects emerged).

The Carpathian Gate remained active for months, witnessed by multiple people, studied by organizations like O.D.R.G. , and documented in detail. It was a stable nodal interface – a place where the membrane between slices was thin enough to allow physical passage.

In RTS terms, this was a Type 3 interaction – a semi-permanent opening, possibly natural, possibly maintained by forces on the other side. The fact that objects could enter but not return (unless in the source phase) confirms the directional nature of such gates: they are not tunnels, but thresholds with their own rules.

4. THE GOLDEN PEAR TREE – FATA PĂDURII AND THE CHILDREN OF LIGHT

In 1974, in the village of Crăciunești, Maramureș, a 12-year-old boy named Dorel Bizeu went to check a magical pear tree. An old man had told him that the tree bore tiny pears that ripened only one day a year. When Dorel arrived, he found seven children – one girl and six boys – standing around the tree.

The girl was hostile, jumping and hissing. But one boy approached Dorel, handed him a pear, and whispered telepathically: "Eat it quickly." Dorel bit into it, but the fruit melted in his hand, turning into water. It tasted of orange and mint – a taste he remembers to this day.

Then a cold hand touched his shoulder. He turned and saw a three-meter-tall woman, with silver-white hair like silk. Her face was severe, her eyes red with anger. Dorel recognized her instantly: Fata Pădurii – the Forest Girl of Romanian folklore, the mother of the "iele," a shape-shifting being who could charm or destroy.

But the boy who had given him the pear spoke again, telepathically: "You did well to eat the pear. Otherwise, this woman – my mother – would have assimilated you." As Dorel ate, the woman's face softened. Her anger melted, and she became radiantly beautiful, with green, glowing eyes. The children around her began to sing – a song about "coming and going from the light."

They spoke in a language Dorel could not understand, yet he understood everything. When he asked where they came from, they answered in verse:

"Tell me who brought you here, our village is from above."

And to him:

"Go your own way, soon you will forget us, but in the middle of your life, you will remember."

Then they vanished.

Dorel spent the next ten years searching for them, wandering the hills and forests. Once, near a lake, he almost caught up with Fata Pădurii, but she flew away with superhuman speed. His mother would tell him: "Fata Pădurii is leading you, my boy." Only later did he understand: they were not of this world.

In RTS terms, this encounter is a perfect example of nodal interaction with a conscious configuration (C_{self}). The children and Fata Pădurii were embodied projections from another slice, able to interact physically, telepathically, and emotionally with a human. The pear was a nodal token – an object that, once accepted, created a resonance between Dorel's C_{self} and theirs, protecting him from "assimilation" (probably a forced transfer).

The fact that Dorel understood their language only during the encounter suggests a temporary coupling of his nodal configuration with theirs – a resonance that faded when they left.

5. LAKE VIDRARU – THE DISC THAT RISES FROM THE WATERS

Lake Vidraru, in the Carpathian Mountains, has been a hotspot of nodal activity for decades. The first recorded encounter was in August 1978. A couple, planning to spend the night near the dam, saw a giant disc rise from the lake:

"Around 11 PM, we both saw a huge disc rise from the lake! It was 30–40 meters in diameter, and we were very close to it. It looked like a giant metal hat, with green-lit windows. It made no sound as it floated smoothly through the air. Our eyes were popping out with fear. For a moment, it seemed to come toward us, but then it tilted and shot into the sky with incredible speed. In seconds, it was just a small dot. Then we looked back at the lake: it was churning with huge waves, crashing against the shores like a stormy sea."

In autumn 1996, a young gendarme on night watch at the dam saw a bright star descend from the sky. It grew larger and larger, until he realized it was a disc, about 800 meters away. It hovered over the lake, then slowly descended and submerged into the water. For a long time, the water glowed intensely from below.

In November 1998, two journalists from Pitești were driving toward the dam when their car suddenly stopped. A rainstorm appeared from nowhere. They met two shepherds with their sheep, dogs barking madly at the sky. The shepherds told them about a light as big as a house that had risen from the lake with a thunderous sound. Then another car stopped – a young couple from Focșani, who had seen the same thing: a giant luminous object, glowing green, emerging from the lake and spraying tons of water everywhere. That spray had been the sudden rainstorm on the road.

Lake Vidraru is a nodal point – a place where the membrane between slices is thin enough to allow physical emergence and submersion of large configurations. The discs are not "ships" in the human sense, but encapsulated nodal membranes – vibrant structures that can transition between slices, using water as a medium (perhaps because water, with its high dielectric constant, facilitates nodal coupling).

6. THE WINGED ONES – A NODAL MYSTERY

6.1. The Siberian Encounter – Dersu Uzala and the Taiga

In the early 20th century, the Russian explorer Vladimir Arseniev traveled through the Sikhote-Alin mountains in eastern Siberia. During one of his expeditions, accompanied by his faithful dog and a native guide, he had an encounter that would stay with him forever.

Walking along a narrow trail, he noticed what seemed to be a human footprint, but something was wrong. Then, from the dense thicket to his left, he heard the sound of breaking branches. His dog began to growl, but instead of attacking, it pressed itself against Arseniev's leg, trembling with fear. Arseniev felt an overwhelming sensation of being watched. A thick fog surrounded them.

For long minutes, they stood still. When Arseniev moved, the presence moved with him. Desperate, he picked up a stone and threw it into the thicket. Suddenly, a massive, dark shape rose from the mist. It had a human-like form, but immense wings. It flew across the river and disappeared. The whole forest seemed to shake. A shriek, like that of a woman, echoed through the trees.

The local Udege people were not surprised. They knew the creature from ancient legends. It was over two meters tall, shrouded in a strange aura, with a human face, large round glowing eyes, and wings instead of arms, ending in sharp claws. Similar accounts existed across the border in China, where it was called "Lidzen-zi" – the winged man. It lived in the mountains, far from humans, and was known to prey on livestock.

6.2. The Soviet Encounter – 1944

In 1944, a Soviet military detachment camped in the same region. One afternoon, a group sent to fetch supplies was attacked from the sky by a gigantic winged creature with a human face, shrieking like a woman. After days of interrogation, the survivors were secretly dispersed. The event was buried in military archives.

Professor Dvujilnii studied these cases for over a decade. He claimed that the creature might be the result of genetic experiments conducted at Unit 731, the infamous Japanese biological warfare facility in Pingfang, Manchuria. During the Sino-Japanese war, thousands died in cruel experiments. Dvujilnii believed that some of these experiments may have created creatures that escaped into the wild.

He even led an expedition into the Pidan mountains, part of the Sikhote-Alin range, where he believed a whole colony of such mutants lived in interconnected caves. With local guides, they found a hidden entrance. Inside, they discovered bones and remains of animals, eaten in a peculiar way. Apex predators like wolves and tigers eat the intestines first, then organs, then the meat. Here, the meat was eaten first. This was not normal predator behavior.

They felt a strong presence, an overwhelming feeling of being watched. Then they heard a sharp, inhuman shriek. They retreated. On their way back through the forest, they found fresh blood and the remains of a ram. It had been killed and eaten in the same unnatural way.

6.3. Mothman – The Winged Prophet of Doom

The same type of creature appeared in the United States, most famously in Point Pleasant, West Virginia, between 1966 and 1967.

On November 15, 1966, four people were driving near Point Pleasant when they saw two bright red lights in front of them. They were eyes, set in a huge, human-like face with immense wings. Terrified, they turned the car around and sped away, reaching 100 mph. The creature flew alongside them. They were stopped by the police, who might have saved them.

In the following days, over 100 similar reports emerged. The creature became known as Mothman. Its appearances continued until December 1967, when the Silver Bridge collapsed, killing 46 people. After the tragedy, Mothman was never seen again.

Local legends spoke of a curse upon the land, a result of the bloody conflicts between settlers and Native Americans centuries earlier. The Shawnee tribe had their own stories of a similar creature, a harbinger of doom, a spirit trapped between worlds, sometimes called a "Child of the Moon." They believed it was a soul forever caught in the realm of the dead, able to cross into our physical world under certain conditions.

6.4. A Nodal Interpretation

How does RTS explain these beings?

1. They are not hallucinations. The consistency of the descriptions across centuries and continents – from Siberia to China to West Virginia – points to a real phenomenon.
2. They are not simply extraterrestrials. While their appearances often coincide with UFO waves, their nature seems more complex. They are linked to specific places (nodal points), to collective trauma (massacres, impending disasters), and to the very fabric of reality.
3. They are nodal echoes or entities. In RTS, a powerful traumatic event – like a massacre or a disaster – creates a strong nodal echo in the Primary Network. This echo can, under certain conditions, become a semi-autonomous configuration, a "patch" in reality. It is not alive in the human sense, but it can be perceived, and it can interact.
4. They are attracted to, or created by, imminent catastrophe. A disaster, being a major reconfiguration of the local slice of reality (C_0), sends ripples through the network. Beings that are themselves echoes of past traumas, or entities capable of perceiving these ripples, are drawn to them. They appear before the event not as prophets, but as witnesses from the other side of the membrane.
5. They are linked to UFOs. Both are manifestations of nodal activity. A UFO might be an encapsulated membrane, a "vehicle" from another slice. A Mothman might be a configuration of consciousness (C_{self}) from another slice, one that is more fluid, more able to exist in the interface between our world and the raw network. The wings, the glowing eyes, the size – these are the forms it takes when it materializes in our slice, shaped by its own nature and our collective expectations.

6.5. Conclusion for RTS

The Winged Ones, like the Zmej, like Fata Pădurii, are part of the same great story. They are the guardians of the threshold, the beings that appear when the membrane between slices is thin, when reality is about to change.

They are not monsters to be feared, but messengers – messengers from a reality we are only beginning to understand. They remind us that the world is not a solid, safe place, but a vibrant, dynamic network, full of mysteries and beings we have yet to name.

In RTS7, they find their place alongside the others, as another piece of the mosaic that is our shared, perennial encounter with the other side.

7. THE GIANTS OF ISRAEL – ANCIENT RETURN

In 1993, Israel became the stage for a series of encounters that would shake the nation. In Kadima, Tsiporet Carmel woke up to a blinding light and saw a strange craft in her yard, with a two-meter-tall being nearby, wearing a metallic suit and a helmet like a beekeeper's. Where the craft had been, a burnt circle was found, along with traces of pure silicon.

In Burgata, Hannah Somech saw her dog thrown into the air and crushed against a wall. She rushed outside and found a two-meter-tall being examining her truck. When she demanded, "What did you do to my dog?" the being replied telepathically: "Get lost. I'm on a mission. I could crush you like an ant if I wanted." Later, a 4.5-meter circle was found in her garden, with grass stained by a red liquid – cadmium.

In Yatztiz, two elderly women heard an explosion. The door burst open, and they saw a 2.5-meter-tall being with a metallic suit, his face hidden by a halo. They slammed the door and called the police, who found deep footprints – 35 centimeters deep, spaced 3.5 meters apart. The being must have weighed about a ton.

All over Israel, similar encounters were reported. The beings were consistently described as giants, about two meters tall, with round faces, metallic suits, and telepathic communication. They left behind circles, cadmium stains, and deep footprints. They seemed to be on a mission – observing, examining, but not interacting beyond necessary.

Ufologist Barry Chamish connected these encounters to the Biblical giants – the Nephilim, who walked the land thousands of years ago. The "Circle of the Giants" on the Golan Heights, a megalithic structure of five concentric stone circles, predates the pyramids by 500 years and cannot be explained by the nomadic tribes of the time. Who built it, if not the giants?

In RTS terms, these giants are nodal guardians – entities whose C_{self} is so coherent that they can interact directly with our slice, without needing biological bodies. They are the same beings that appeared in ancient times, that built the megaliths, that left their footprints in the earth and their memory in myths. They never left. They just became quieter.

8. THE SHIKMONA IMPRINT – A PHOTOGRAPH FROM THE SKY

In September 1990, on Shikmona Beach near Haifa, Ami Achrai saw a disc-shaped craft spinning over the Mediterranean, emitting an intense red light, then disappearing. Two days later, he returned with ufologist Hadassah Arbel and found a 15-meter elliptical imprint burned into the sand. But more astonishing was what the vegetation around it revealed: a perfect image of a pilot in front of a control panel.

Samples of the burned sand were sent to a lab. When exposed to studio lights, the sand melted – it was coated with a hydrocarbon that melted at medium temperatures. No natural or human explanation could account for it.

In 2002, a second identical imprint appeared a few meters away. In 2003, two teenagers reported a disc exploding over the same beach. Metal fragments were found – pure magnesium, cold to the touch, turning to white ash when handled, glowing when submerged in water. Magnetic activity at the site was 6000 times higher than normal.

The Shikmona imprints are nodal photographs – not burns, but controlled imprints of a configuration from another slice. The pilot image, repeated in the vegetation, is a signature – a way of saying, "We were here." And the fact that the same image appears in Elijah's Cave, 200 meters away, painted on the rock thousands of years ago, suggests that the same beings have been leaving the same marks for millennia.

9. THE 1996 COLLISION – WHEN TWO WORLDS CLASHED

In 1996, a Yugoslav immigrant named Spasso Maximovitch filmed something impossible over the town of Rosh Haayin: two UFOs colliding in mid-air. The footage, analyzed by Jeff Saino of MUFON's elite labs, showed:

- Impossible speed – far beyond human technology.
- A violent explosion – yet no debris left behind.
- Authenticity confirmed – the footage was declared genuine.

In RTS terms, this was not a collision of physical objects, but a destructive interference of two nodal configurations. When two encapsulated membranes vibrate at incompatible frequencies, they can annihilate each other – returning to the background state of the network, leaving no trace. The explosion was real, but it was an explosion of energy patterns, not matter.

10. THE VISION OF JACQUES VALLÉE – ONE PHENOMENON, MANY MASKS

Jacques Vallée, after decades of research, reached a radical conclusion: UFOs, religious apparitions, folklore creatures, and modern encounters are all manifestations of the same perennial phenomenon. He showed that:

- Apparitions of the Virgin Mary share identical patterns with UFO encounters – lights, messages, physical traces.
- In Catholic countries, the phenomenon takes the form of the Virgin; in Orthodox countries, it appears as God the Father; in India, as Vishnu or Shiva. The culture shapes the mask, but the phenomenon is the same.
- Abductees often describe their experiences as half physical, half spiritual – exactly like the beings themselves.
- Angels, demons, fairies, and aliens are different names for the same visitors.

Vallée's hypothesis is that we are dealing with a control system – a phenomenon that has guided, shaped, and perhaps even created human beliefs for millennia. And the reason they don't communicate directly? Because the distance between them and us is like the distance between us and ants. We are a potential future hypercivilization, and they are watching – waiting to see what we become.

11. Natural Portals at a Cosmic Scale: The Sun-Earth Case

11.1. A NASA Discovery

In 2008, physicist David Seebeck at NASA's Goddard Space Flight Center confirmed the existence of magnetic portals that cyclically open between Earth and the Sun. These are magnetic cylinders with a diameter comparable to that of Earth, through which high-energy particles travel from the Sun into Earth's magnetosphere.

The essential characteristics of these portals are:

- Precise cyclicity: they open approximately every 8 minutes, regardless of solar activity or solar wind speed.
- Two types: some are active (allow an easy flow of particles) and form at equatorial latitudes; others are passive (impede the flow) and appear at higher latitudes.
- Cylindrical structure: they are described as "magnetic cylinders" with a complex internal organization, which scientists do not yet fully understand.

11.2. What RTS Says About This Phenomenon

In RTS terms, these portals are natural nodal points connecting two distinct configurations of the Primary Network: our slice (C_0) and another configuration associated with the Sun (C_{sun}). Their characteristics confirm several principles of slice dynamics:

- Cyclicity – the occurrence at fixed 8-minute intervals indicates a nodal frequency proper to the Sun-Earth system, independent of external factors. Exactly as we described in the Carpathian Gate case, which had cyclic access and source phases.
- Active and passive types – correspond to the access phases (open to flow) and isolation phases (closed) we encountered in all stable interfaces. The latitude difference (equator vs. poles) suggests that the orientation of nodal fields (A_{ij}) influences the portal's regime.
- Cylindrical structure – confirms that portals are not simple holes, but have an internal topology ("magnetic cylinders"), which in RTS we call the topological stabilization layer of the membrane.

11.3. Implications

This NASA discovery is important for several reasons:

1. It proves that portals are not just rare phenomena, but part of the ordinary functioning of the solar system. They are perfectly natural "flux transfer events" (FTEs) that occur thousands of times a day.
2. It confirms that cyclicity and internal structure are universal characteristics of nodal interfaces. What we observed in the Carpathians or at Mediaş are not exceptions, but manifestations at a human scale of the same laws that govern the cosmos.

3. It opens the way for collaboration between space physics and RTS. If NASA can measure these portals with probes (Cluster, THEMIS), it means we already have tools to study nodality on a large scale. We just need to look at the data through the right lens.

11.4. Open Questions

- What causes these portals to open exactly every 8 minutes? Is there a "nodal clock" in the Sun-Earth system?
- How does this cyclicity relate to the rotation of the cosmic skirt and to accelerated expansion?
- If these portals are natural, can they be induced or amplified technologically, as some sources suggest?

12. THE RTS INTERPRETATION – A COHERENT FRAMEWORK

All these stories – from the Jiu Valley to Israel, from Vidraru to Maramureş – find a coherent explanation in the RTS framework:

- Slices of reality ($C_\alpha, C_\beta, \dots$): These beings come from other stable configurations of the Primary Network. They are not "extraterrestrial" in the space-travel sense, but extra-dimensional in the nodal sense.
- Membranes and gates: Places like the Carpathian Gate, Lake Vidraru, Shikmona Beach, and the Golan Heights are nodal points where the membrane between slices is thin.
- Encapsulated membranes: UFOs are not ships, but vibrant nodal configurations – living membranes that can change shape, become invisible, or dive into water.
- Guardians and explorers: The Zmei, the giants, Fata Pădurii – these are nodal entities with their own missions. Some observe, some guard, some occasionally interact.
- The perennial phenomenon: All encounters, across millennia and cultures, are interactions between slices. The masks change, but the reality behind them does not.

13. CONCLUSION – REMOVING THE BLINDERS

We have lived for millennia with blinders on, interpreting each encounter through the lens of our own culture and beliefs. Angels, demons, fairies, giants, aliens – we have given them a thousand names, without realizing they are the same visitors, wearing different masks.

The RTS framework offers a way to remove the blinders. It shows that:

- The Zmei of the Jiu Valley are the same beings as the giants of Israel.
- Fata Pădurii is the same presence as the Virgin of Lourdes.
- The Carpathian Gate is the same phenomenon as the Shikmona imprints.
- Lake Vidraru is the same nodal point as the Golan Heights.

This is the great story – a story that spans continents, millennia, and cultures. It is the story of humanity's continuous, silent companionship with beings from other slices of reality. They have always been here. They watch, they wait, they occasionally step through the membrane. And they leave behind traces – in our myths, our religions, our folklore, and our modern encounters.

The question is not whether they exist. The question is: when will we finally remove the blinders and see them for what they truly are?

End of RTS7.
